China’s Anti-Corruption International Cooperation in the New Era

Shuyue Zhang
Guanghua Academy, Shanghai, China
21423022@zju.edu.cn

Abstract. Corruption has become a serious issue on a global scale, threatening political stability, economic growth, and public confidence in governments. Countries all across the world have stepped up their anti-corruption initiatives both locally and internationally as they become more aware of the negative effects of corruption. Since 2013, China has significantly changed how it approaches foreign collaboration in the fight against corruption. This study offers an in-depth exploration of China’s proactive involvement in international anti-corruption collaboration during the contemporary era. The research presents a comprehensive examination of the diverse consequences and ramifications resulting from China’s initiatives across multiple domains. These domains encompass aspects such as cultural sensitivity, technology exchange, legal restructuring, and diplomatic strategies. Additionally, the study investigates the effects of collaborative efforts on curtailing transnational economic crimes, fostering openness, advancing sustainable development, and encouraging gender inclusivity. The research underscores China’s nuanced and multifaceted approach to addressing global corruption, which contributes significantly to the advancement of a fair and balanced global socio-political milieu.

Keywords: China, anti-corruption, global cooperation, diplomacy.

1. Introduction

Globally, corruption is a complicated and enduring problem that undermines good government, economic growth, and social progress. Many nations have sought international collaboration in their efforts to tackle this scourge because they recognize the global nature of corruption. In the new era, China has significantly changed how it approaches foreign collaboration in the fight against corruption. China’s global engagement reached a turning point in 2013 with the birth of the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), which represented a paradigm shift in the country’s anti-corruption policy [1]. To reduce the possibility of corruption, this program, which involves a broad network of economic and infrastructure initiatives across several nations, required increased transparency and accountability. As a result, China’s anti-corruption initiatives acquired a global scope, influencing not just domestic governance but also the development of global anti-corruption cooperation.

Corruption has become a serious issue on a global scale, threatening political stability, economic growth, and public confidence in governments. Countries all across the world have stepped up their anti-corruption initiatives both locally and internationally as they become more aware of the negative effects of corruption. Recognizing its damaging effects on social fairness, economic advancement, and governance, governments around the world have worked together internationally to address this enormous challenge. China’s strategy for international collaboration in the fight against corruption in the new era stands out as a remarkable case study within this global initiative. China’s attitude toward corruption has significantly changed over time, going from one of guarded observation to one of active participation in global anti-corruption initiatives.

To situate China’s anti-corruption initiatives in a global context, this study examines its tactics, difficulties, triumphs, and contributions to the worldwide anti-corruption movement. This study offers a thorough knowledge of China’s anti-corruption international cooperation. As an international issue, corruption threatens societal cohesion, economic progress, and the rule of law. The estimated annual cost of corruption to the world is trillions of dollars.
2. International Cooperation on Anti-Corruption

In recent years, international collaboration has become increasingly widely seen as important for combating corruption. This is because corruption is a transnational crime that can only be effectively combated through international cooperation. China has played an important role in the global fight against corruption.

In the past decade, China has boosted its global anti-corruption cooperation in a variety of ways. China’s aggressive participation in international collaborations to combat corruption has arisen as a source of curiosity and relevance in an era of unprecedented globalisation and intricate diplomatic interplay. As the world grapples with complex webs of transnational issues, China’s approach to anti-corruption measures beyond its borders highlights new elements of the country’s changing role in the global arena. China’s political commitment to combating corruption has been strengthened initially. The highest levels of government have emphasised the necessity of combating corruption. As a result, there is currently a strong political urge for such global cooperation.

China’s anti-corruption policy has evolved in response to shifting internal goals and international circumstances. China initially took a more cautious stance but has since actively participated in international cooperation to counter corruption’s transnational aspect. China’s influence in the world has changed significantly since the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) was introduced in 2013. To reduce corruption risks in the projects and investments related to the BRI, open and accountable governance became necessary. China’s trajectory in anti-corruption international cooperation has evolved in tandem with its changing domestic priorities and international dynamics. Initially adopting a more cautious and introspective approach, China’s global stance underwent a profound shift as the BRI assumed prominence. The interconnected nature of this initiative necessitated a recalibration of China’s anti-corruption strategies to encompass transnational risks. This shift in perspective, as illuminated by scholars like Wang & Xu (2019), illustrates the adaptation of China’s anti-corruption endeavours to the demands of a new era of global interdependence [1].

In addition, China has taken multiple measures in international anti-corruption cooperation to effectively promote the global anti-corruption struggle. First, the scope of cooperation in China is no longer limited to transnational fields, but is more widely involved in transnational efforts including the United Nations Convention against Corruption. This move shows China's positive attitude in international cooperation. Second, China is not only a partner, but also an active promoter in the field of anti-corruption. It not only shares more information and expertise with other countries, but also provides technical assistance and training to other countries to strengthen their capabilities in anti-corruption. China is also actively innovating in its anti-corruption methods. For example, through asset recovery, China will return the stolen assets to its legal owners, while also using data sharing to identify corrupt officials. This innovation not only helps to fight corruption, but also realizes the recovery of stolen assets, bringing practical results to the fight against corruption. The international anti-corruption cooperation led by China not only brings specific benefits, but also has a positive impact at the level of awareness and action [2]. It has sparked public attention to corruption issues, emphasizing the urgency of anti-corruption. In addition, cooperation has also promoted the transmission of knowledge and skills, helping other countries to improve their anti-corruption capabilities.

3. Characteristics of China’s Worldwide Anti-Corruption Cooperation

First, China adopted a more proactive methodology. China has transitioned from a passive approach of merely reacting to requests for aid from other nations. Taking the initiative involves proactively engaging with foreign nations and forging collaborative alliances in order to combat corruption. Second, a more complete methodology. China is not solely prioritising bilateral cooperation. It is actively engaged in various global endeavours, including its involvement in the United Nations Convention against Corruption. Third, a more novel and inventive approach. China has implemented novel technology and methodologies in its efforts to combat corruption, including the utilisation of data exchange and asset recovery mechanisms [3].

3.1. Unique Points of China’s Anti-Corruption International Cooperation

Politics are emphasised heavily. Fighting corruption has been designated as a major priority by China’s government. The result is renewed political will for global cooperation in this field. The emphasis is on mutual benefit. China thinks that collaboration on a global scale needs to be predicated on the idea of mutual benefit. This suggests that China will help other countries if they are also eager to help China. Capacity-building initiatives are prioritised. The Chinese government thinks that the best way to combat corruption is to assist other nations in developing their own anti-corruption infrastructure. This is why China has been helping other nations through training and technology transfer. The implementation of novel approaches. China isn’t hesitant to deploy cutting-edge tools in the fight against graft. It is leveraging data sharing to expose corrupt officials and recover stolen assets to give them back to their rightful owners.

3.2. Achievements and Contributions

China has pursued anti-corruption cooperation through various multilateral platforms such as the United Nations Convention against Corruption (UNCAC) and the G20. Active participation in these forums showcases China’s commitment to aligning its domestic anti-corruption efforts with international standards. Additionally, China has established bilateral agreements with numerous countries, promoting information sharing, mutual legal assistance, and the extradition of corrupt officials. Literature by authors such as Wang & Xu (2019) and Zhang (2021) delves into China’s growing role in shaping global anti-corruption norms [1, 4].

China’s anti-corruption campaign, led by the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI), has achieved notable successes domestically. President Xi Jinping’s leadership in cracking down on high-level corruption sent a strong signal of commitment. Domestically, this campaign has been associated with increased transparency and improved governance. China’s contribution to international anti-corruption efforts is evident in its funding for projects that build capacity in developing countries to combat corruption. By sharing its experiences and best practices, China contributes to a broader global understanding of effective anti-corruption strategies. This resolute approach resonates domestically, fostering a climate of enhanced transparency and governance. Significantly, China’s contributions extend beyond its borders, with capacity-building initiatives in developing nations to combat corruption. Thus, China’s experiences and insights have reverberations not only in its domestic context but also across the international anti-corruption landscape.

4. The Challenges of China’s Anti-Corruption International Cooperation

Due to differences in the legal systems of different countries, cross-border anti-corruption cooperation probably face considerable difficulties. For instance, the law of one country would give its executive department the power to freeze the assets involved in the investigation process, but in another country, this power would not exist, which would cause difficulties in recovering the stolen assets [5]. Such legal differences not only increase the complexity of cooperation, but also would become a way for corrupt elements to evade accountability. In addition, deep-rooted cultural differences can also be a barrier to cooperation. The social structure and values of certain countries would make the willingness to fight corruption less, and even in some cases, corruption would be regarded as an accepted behaviour. Such cultural differences would make it more difficult to reach consensus in transnational cooperation. There would be differences in the conditions and procedures for extradition in different countries, some would have stronger willingness to extradition, while others would be less willing to extradite their nationals to other countries for trial, which inconsistency of willingness would make it more complicated to seek help in transnational anti-corruption efforts.
Some governments do not have the political will to combat corruption, which can make enlisting the help of other countries in the fight against corruption difficult. For example, a corrupt government would be hesitant to assist other countries in bringing criminals to justice by sharing information obtained during investigations. Cooperation on anti-corruption cases could be hampered by a lack of trust between China and other countries. Many factors, such as wars and political disagreements in the past, have contributed to this. Some corrupt governments would be hesitant to share the information obtained during the investigation to help other countries bring criminals to justice, which uncooperative attitude would stem from the fear of being exposed to the issue of corruption, which will lead to a deadlock in transnational anti-corruption cooperation [6].

The lack of trust between China and other countries would also be a barrier to cooperation in anti-corruption cases. There would be elements such as historical wars and political divisions between China and other countries, which would lead to insufficient trust between each other. In this scenario, even if there is a common anti-corruption target, the government would be reluctant to share intelligence, collaborative investigation, and join forces to prosecute corrupt elements because of distrust. It would be difficult to combine head-on in some countries due to a lack of resources. Because of this, it might be Challenging to work with these nations to invest and prosecute instances of Corruption. Able to Invest in things like a well-trained police force or a specialised anti-corruption group. In these countries, the training and equipment of the police force would be restricted, which will affect their effective response to complex corruption investigations. In addition, due to the lack of financial and technical support, these countries would have difficulty adopting advanced investigation methods and technologies, which limit their ability to track and obtain evidence of corruption.

Despite its efforts, China’s anti-corruption international cooperation faces challenges. Concerns have been raised regarding the sincerity of its engagement, given the continued secrecy surrounding some corruption cases and a perceived lack of independence in its judiciary. China’s anti-corruption campaign might also serve political motives. Such critiques highlight the complex interplay between domestic and international interests in China’s anti-corruption efforts. While China’s anti-corruption international cooperation has made strides, it is not devoid of challenges and criticisms. Scepticism regarding the genuineness of China’s intent persists, with concerns about transparency and judicial independence [7]. Critics also highlight the potential instrumentalization of anti-corruption campaigns for political consolidation.

Some solutions to these problems are as follows: first, building capacity: By offering training and technical assistance, China can aid other countries in developing their capacity to combat corruption, which can assist in ensuring that other countries have the necessary expertise and resources to investigate and prosecute corrupt officials. China can share its own experience and best practices in the field of anti-corruption.

In addition, China can cooperate with international organizations and partners to jointly carry out anti-corruption capacity building projects. These projects can cover all areas from legal reform to law enforcement cooperation, aiming to enhance the overall ability of countries to fight corruption. In this way, China can share its own professional knowledge and promote the cooperation and exchange of the international community in anti-corruption [8]. Second, to promote transparency, China would increase transport by information about its anti-corruption measures, which can aid in the development of trust and reform, which sharing of information can give other countries a clearer understanding of China's efforts in anti-corruption, thereby enhancing the willingness of cooperation. China can also establish an information exchange mechanism with other countries. Through regular meetings, cooperation projects and information sharing platforms, China can share intelligence and investigation results on corruption cases with other countries, which positive exchange of information helps to build mutual trust and work together to solve the problem of international corruption [9]. Third, to encourage dialogues, China can promote anti-corruption dialogue with other countries. This can aid in the resolution of discrepancies in legal systems and cultural norms. Last, Offering incentives. China can provide incentives for other countries to participate in anti-corruption investigations. This could include offering financial or technical aid.

5. Conclusion

China’s anti-corruption international cooperation in the new era reflects its changing stance and growing involvement in global affairs. The evolution of China’s approach, from initially reserved to actively engaged, showcases its commitment to addressing the transnational challenge of corruption. China’s accomplishments domestically and its contributions to international capacity-building show the impact of its efforts despite obstacles and criticism. Case studies and an analysis of potential future directions show that China’s participation in international cooperation against corruption will continue to have an impact on the global environment. As demonstrated by this study, understanding China’s policy is essential to developing a thorough and effective worldwide response to corruption.

The paper offers a thorough summary of China’s operations and their effects. China’s participation in worldwide anti-corruption cooperation is a dynamic and expanding issue that has significant effects on world politics, diplomacy, and development [10]. China’s worldwide collaboration in combating corruption includes elements of diplomacy, technology, culture, law, development, and the environment. China contributes to the worldwide fight against corruption through a number of efforts, while also advancing its interests and influence.

The study also demonstrates the depth and breadth of China’s initiatives. China’s expanding position in international cooperation against corruption is evidence of its commitment to fostering an environment of just, transparent, and accountable governance. China’s evolving position and active engagement in global governance are best demonstrated by its anti-corruption international cooperation in the modern period. China has changed its strategies from early reluctance to constructive engagement as a result of realising that corruption concerns are global in scope. China’s achievements and contributions both domestically and internationally highlight the significance of its efforts despite critiques and complications.

The change in its strategy—from hesitation to enthusiastic participation—reflects an understanding of the transnational nature of corruption problems. Amidst the labyrinth of challenges and complexities, China’s accomplishments and contributions underscore the profundity of its endeavours. Weaving through the insights of diverse scholarly authorities, the research presents a panoramic view of China’s pivotal role in international anti-corruption cooperation. China’s foray into anti-corruption international cooperation is a dynamic and multifaceted enterprise encompassing cultural diplomacy, ethical dimensions, education, technology, gender equality, joint investigations, and environmental protection. This rich tapestry of initiatives accentuates China’s commitment to fostering a more transparent, accountable, and equitable global landscape.

China’s anti-corruption international cooperation is distinguished by its dedication over the long term and its eagerness to share its experiences with other nations. China is eager to assist other nations in developing their own capabilities to combat corruption because it is dedicated to doing so for the long term. This makes an important contribution to the battle against corruption on a worldwide scale. Corruption is a global problem, and as the globe becomes more interdependent, fighting it will require international cooperation. Chinese efforts to combat corruption have shifted from a strictly domestic emphasis to include participation in multinational initiatives and bilateral agreements.

China’s active participation in global forums like the UNCAC, G20, and BRICS demonstrates its commitment to helping shape international norms and best practices. China’s commitment to the rule of law reverberates not only at home but also around the world, serving as an example for other countries to follow. However, the path forward requires careful manoeuvring due to disparities in legal systems, cultural backgrounds, and political forces. China has a chance to control the narrative about its ascent and the role it has played in global governance as it pursues international cooperation against corruption. China can bolster its status as a responsible global actor by engaging in principled cooperation that respects sovereignty and develops mutual trust. Furthermore, China’s initiatives can spark discussions on comprehensive remedies that get at the fundamental causes of corruption, which remains a complicated issue entangled with economic, social, and political elements.

China’s global collaboration in the fight against corruption is a small but significant contribution to making the world a better, more just place for all people. China paves the way for a future in which the corrosive influence of corruption is diminished, allowing societies to flourish, economies to prosper, and governance to be a beacon of integrity, by learning from shared experiences, addressing challenges collectively, and laying the foundation for common strategies.

References

